Excerpt: . . . he wept, came Sleep, the comforter. Back unto the better time, far down into the beautiful Ever blooming haunts of Hope, the wizard Slumber bore him. In the village street he played among his old companions, But unto him, even then, a sorrow came and smote him--Came and smote him, as the first fair flowers of spring are smitten By the frost-winds of a world in which they wake too early; For, while in the street he played among his dear companions, From his heart the bird named Joy, that had its nest within it, In a fearful flight flew forth. For from his fathers cottage Came a crowd of people, clad in garments black and gloomy, Bearing down the village lane toward him a white sleeper; Bearing by him where he stood the corse of his dear mother! Sadly by her grave he crept down, in the acre holy. Down upon her coffin door he heard the clay-clods rattle, And the dong of the death-bell into his heart was driven, So that, from his slumber in the hawthorn grove he started--Started from his slumber in the hawthorn grove, exclaiming: Wrong it is to murmur with the pleasure of the present! From my journey to my past this wisdom I have won: That the Eden of my youth was not all bright and pleasant; Teach me, holy Lord of Life, to say Thy will be done! A GREETING TO SUMMER. T TAIL! of seasons...
