Is it the daredevil who leaps a chasm in the hope that they can reach the dangling chain and strike the head cultist before they can finish their unholy ritual? Or is it the careful planner, who skulks in the shadows assessing the dangers around the demonic altar, sets up a trap and, with a clever ruse, tricks the cultist into it? Is a good adventurer the loner who fights a personal crusade against evil or the loyal friend who lays down his life to give his friends a fighting chance in their darkest hour? There are as many definitions of "adventurer" as there are adventurers, with all their nuances, approaches and different personalities, themselves. Adventuring is a dangerous and fickle career and there are as many heroes as there are villains who have gained fame and fortune by setting out into the unknown, armed with wits or brawn, weapons or magic, willpower or stamina or, most dangerous, a mixture of all of them. Even the word "adventuring" itself lends itself to much confusion, for common people view a self-professed adventurer with a mix of awe and fear, for they are not sure if they are dealing with a selfless crusader or a ruthless mercenary....
